The AWKWARD AGE

RONNIE'S heart descended to his toes as he looked into the mirror. And that was a long distance for his heart to travel, since Ron was almost six feet, two inches tall, though he was not quite seventeen years old. Now, as he looked at his reflection in his navy blue suit, he was completely miserable!

For, if he had heard it once, he had heard it a thousand times. "He's at the awkward age," his parents would declare, smiling and yet meaning it. "He will come out of it in time!"

Why, at this very moment, mom was poking her head round the door to inspect him and see if he was okay for the party. And not meaning to hurt him or make him unhappy, she smiled and said, "It's no use, Ron, you're just too big!"

To Ron, the idea of going to a party was just about as welcome as getting a case of measles. He was sure to bump into things, to be the butt of jokes and comments, to find that any girl he might ask to dance would measure his height first and then reply, "No, thanks, I'm resting." But he couldn't get out of going, for then there would have to be so many explanations at home. It sure was hard to make people understand that a guy couldn't help being too tall, any more than he could help being snub-nosed!

As Ron walked down the block to the house where the party was being given, he cringed inwardly. Well, he would just put in an appearance, sit around a while and then leave. That would be the easiest way, with no questions asked.

Shyly, Ron entered the living room, feeling like a giant who had just invaded a city of dwarves. All around him, couples were dancing, laughing, joking, munching on wieners and having a fine time.

"I don't fit in," Ron thought, settling himself into an easy chair. "I'm too awkward."

As he looked about the room, Ron caught sight of a girl sitting all by herself in a corner. Although he had never seen her before, Ron had a funny feeling that he knew what she was thinking. There was something about the expression on her face that told him she was unhappy, that she, too, felt out of place and alone!

It took a lot of courage for Ron to do what he did next. Rising to his full height, he walked across the room, introduced himself to the lonely-looking girl and asked shyly, "Would you care to dance with me?"

"Yes, I would. I really would!" she answered, surprising Ron by the eagerness in her voice.

When she stood up, Ron understood everything. This girl . . . well, she was sensational! She came right up to the tip of Ron's ear, and he didn't have to stoop clumsily to encircle her waist. This was a king-sized girl, all right! In a flash, without a word, Ron knew what this girl must have suffered.

"You're . . . just right!" he told her, as they danced together gracefully, smoothly. "You're just right for me!" And in his heart, Ron knew that he had just passed the awkward age!

A GIRL for MICKEY

MICKEY WAYNE'S eyes rested adoringly on Linda Rogers. Yes-siree, no doubt about it! She was the dream-dish of the class, so different, for instance, from Ruth Palmer who sat right in front of her. Ruth was brown-haired and brown-eyed and sorta serious. But Linda! Red curls, blue eyes and a blue fuzzy sweater to match 'em!

Mickey was well aware that at least half the guys in the class were crazy about Linda. She had glamour with a capital "G" and a clear, tinkling laugh that made a guy feel as though he'd said something extra-clever. For weeks, Mickey had dreamed of asking her for a date, but the thought that Linda might refuse him sent cold shivers of embarrassment up his spine.

"But if I never ask her, how am I gonna know?" Mickey wondered, staring right through the algebra problem in front of him. "Gosh, a fella's got to take the plunge sometime!"

That instant, a daring thought came into Mickey's mind. He would ask Linda . . . right now! Tearing a sheet from his loose-leaf notebook, Mickey scribbled rapidly, "Dear Linda, don't think I'm being fresh or anything, but I think you're gorgeous. You're the kind of girl I've been dreaming about. Would you please give me a date as soon as possible? Next Saturday, for instance?"

Signing his name, Mickey signalled to the boy next to him that he wanted a note passed. "To Linda Rogers" his lips soundlessly gave instruction. The note had quite a long way to go, and it passed silently from hand to hand across the classroom.

But, only two desks away from Linda, the note met with disaster. Eagle-eyed Miss Conifer, who had evidently been following its passage with some interest, pounced on the note, her long fingers seizing it tightly.

"Well," she said sarcastically, "there appears to be something more interesting than algebra on someone's mind this morning! Shall we see what that fascinating topic can be?"

Mickey wanted to sink through the floor as he saw Miss Conifer unfold his note, his declaration of love, and prepare to read it to the class. It was personal! It was private! How could Miss Conifer be so hard-hearted? Mickey's ears burned as he heard her dry, precise voice read the words he had written!

Miss Conifer's sarcasm was bad enough. But the laughter and jeering of the class was worse. All the kids craned their necks to watch Mickey squirm unhappily. They laughed at him! As Mickey looked wildly around the room, his misery increased. For laughing louder than the rest, laughing at him, was Linda Rogers! To her, his admiration and humiliation were huge jokes!

Hurt and disillusioned, Mickey felt like crying. But as he swallowed, he saw one face, only one out of the entire class, that looked at him with sympathy and understanding. One pair of brown eyes seemed to say, "You have nothing to be ashamed of. They're all being mean!"

A sudden warmth came over Mickey. Now he could face the laughter and the jokes. For, though he had never exchanged a word with Ruth Palmer, he knew that he had found his girl . . . just the girl he'd been dreaming of!

TEN MINUTES LATER...

LIKE I SAID THIS MORNING, I DON'T CARE ABOUT THE PRICE! IT'S HOW LONG THEY LAST!

AMO, AMAS, AMAT!

IT was a labor of love, pure and simple. For two months, Meg had been coaching Don in Latin, trying to drum the declensions and conjugations into his head. Not that Don was stupid! He wasn't. It was just that he couldn't seem to latch on to Latin. And with the end-term exams coming up, he had to pass, he had to!

The reason Meg felt so intensely about this was that she felt intensely about Don. To put it plainly, she was in love with him. Of course, that was Meg's secret, for Don had never given her a second glance. He considered her a grind and a drip, a girl who would rather spend an evening in the library than dancing at the "Y".

"If only he'd give me a chance! If he would just ask me, once!" Meg sighed wistfully. "I guess it's not smart for a girl to be smart, but I can't help it!"

Don, naturally, had no knowledge of these hopes, which Meg kept well concealed beneath a stack of textbooks. He was grateful for her help and that was about all.

And now cram night was here, the evening before the big Latin exam. Don was so jittery that he was willing to declare himself a failure before he had even taken the exam. "I'll never make it, Meg," he said disconsolately.

"You will so!" Meg replied sturdily. "Why, you know the stuff inside and out by now. You're just nervous, that's all. Everyone gets nervous before a big test!"

"Do you really think I know enough?" Don asked.

"Of course you do! Just promise me one thing . . . that you'll spend tonight studying the irregular verbs, just to make sure. They're usually the stickers on an exam. Promise?"

"Promise!" Don gave his word. "And thanks a lot, Meg."

"And that's that," Meg thought as she turned and walked towards the library. "I'm just not his type, I guess."

A few hours later, as Meg was on her way home, she passed by the ice cream joint. An unexpected sight made her stop short and stare. There, sharing a tall coke with Millie Powell, and not studying his irregular verbs as he had promised, was Don! Indignation welled up in Meg like a fountain. This was too much! To be ignored by Don was bad enough, but to see him fail in a promise was unforgivable!

Storming into the ice cream joint, Meg faced Don squarely and let him have it. "I guess you are a dope," she said clearly, "not caring whether you pass or fail! Don't you want to graduate, you big lunk-head? And how do you think I feel, after having coached you so long? Now I don't care whether you keep your promise or not! So there!"

Turning, Meg marched out of the ice cream joint, her head high. From a corner of her eye, she could see Don sheepishly paying for the coke. He was going home to study. Well, let him! For now Meg felt that she had lost any chance she might have had with Don. He would ignore her forever!

The next day, right after the Latin exam, Meg left the auditorium and started down the steps. A light touch on her shoulder stopped her. "Gosh, you're terrific!" Don said happily. "I knew everything!" And then, before running down the steps, he added quickly, "Save the Senior Prom for me!"
